Health Check Items

We're able to estimate precisely what we can ship in a given cycle and given resources.

57 ↗ +27

Our sprint increments can be shipped after the iteration without requiring additional work.

50 ↗ +20

We get stuff done really quickly. No waiting, no delays.

44 ↗ +11

We limit our 'Work in Progress' to maintain focus at all times.

61 ↗ +21

I am super satisfied with our delivery in the last weeks.

76 ↗ +39

What are recent examples for an increment that wasn't working/shippable at the end of the sprint?

The directions to a next class issue was not working on my local and thus not allowing me to pr on time

Tests failing on bus schedule PR

It would help if issues like the directions to next class were better documented or tested across environments. That way, we can catch local compatibility problems earlier and avoid delays in PR submissions.

When did our ways of working create a suboptimal flow of work? (e.g. policies are unclear, not suitable or not adhered to)

Tasks were not clearly defined in JIRA work items

When we had multiple deadlocks and people waiting on each other to finish a task

During the Sprint , we implemented the user login feature, but it wasn't shippable because the backend authentication API wasn't integrated properly. On local environments, login requests were failing due to incorrect environment variables, so we couldn't test the complete flow before the sprint ended.

When did our way of working work well?

The meetings on the weekends and the task updates

When we had everyone focused on their task where people would be responsive and active

When we worked in pairs and updated each other

The help channel was used

update on task helped with progress on other tasks

What else do you want to talk about in our retro?

Task Acknowledgement and Clarification

Everyone that gets assigned a task should respond that they receive it and ask for clarification if they don't understand something. After a period of inactivity, the task should be redistributed.
